Ball players raise ire of Oak Street residents

The number of baseball fields in Chicago is dropping, and Oak Street residents are among those feeling the pinch. The Oak Street residents, who are served by the Niles Park District, have been given the option of playing their games elsewhere, but they are not happy with the decision.

The Niles Park District has announced that it will close one of its baseball fields at Oak Street and Dempster Street. The decision was made after the district received complaints from the residents about the loud noise and the lack of lighting at the field.

The Niles Park District has been under pressure to make changes to its facilities due to a lack of funding. The district has announced that it will close one of its pools and one of its tennis courts to save money.

Residents of Oak Street are concerned about the loss of the baseball field, which they say is an important part of the neighborhood. They say that the field is used by children and adults alike and that its closure will have a negative impact on the community.
