Shades were once thought to be necessary for the comfort and health of the elderly. As we learn more about the damaging effects of sunlight, the importance of sun protection has become clear. The use of sunglasses is not only a matter of style, but also a matter of health. The elderly are particularly vulnerable to the harmful effects of the sun's rays, which can cause damage to the eyes, skin, and immune system.

Back to school: New shoes, fresh supplies and an eye exam

Your children are excited about the new school year. From new friends and new teachers, to fresh supplies and a fresh start, it's easy to get caught up in the excitement of back to school. But don't forget, your children also need to be prepared. A few tips to make sure your children are ready for the upcoming school year:

1. Back to school shopping: Make sure your children have the necessary supplies for the new school year. This includes backpacks, notebooks, pens, pencils, and more. Don't forget to check with your children's teachers to see if there are any specific supplies they need.

2. Eye exams: Regular eye exams are crucial for ensuring your children have healthy vision. Many schools offer free or discounted eye exams to students. Check with your local school or your child's school to see if they offer this service.

3. Clothing: Make sure your children have the appropriate clothing for the upcoming school year. This includes uniforms, gym clothes, and more. Many schools have specific dress codes, so it's important to check with your child's school to see what is required.

Remember, back to school time can be stressful, but it's also an exciting time. By preparing your children for the new school year, you can help them have a successful and enjoyable experience.

Tomato leaf diseases flourish in moist weather

The National Institute of Food and Agriculture (NIFA) provides research and education programs that focus on improving the health and quality of life for all Americans through the discovery, development, and dissemination of new knowledge and technology. NIFA's mission is to support research, education, and extension programs that are conducted by Cooperative Extension Service faculty and other experts in the field of agriculture and related sciences.

Tomato diseases can be a significant problem for gardeners and farmers, as they can lead to reduced yields and crop loss. There are several factors that can contribute to the occurrence of tomato diseases, including weather conditions, soil moisture levels, and crop management practices. To help prevent and control tomato diseases, it is important to maintain good cultural practices, such as proper spacing, adequate air circulation, and timely control measures.

Weather conditions such as high temperatures and high humidity can also favor the development of tomato diseases. For example, powdery mildew, a fungal disease that causes white or gray powdery growth on the leaves, is favored by warm, humid conditions. Similarly, early blight, a bacterial disease that causes brown spots on the leaves, is favored by cool, damp weather.

It is important to monitor the health of your tomato plants and to take appropriate action if you notice signs of disease. For example, if you notice powdery mildew, you may need to use a fungicide to control the disease. Similarly, if you notice early blight, you may need to rotate your crops to avoid re-infection. It is also important to remove and destroy infected plant material to prevent the disease from spreading to other plants.

Tomato diseases can also be controlled through cultural practices such as crop rotation, proper irrigation, and proper pruning. For example, crop rotation can help to break the disease cycle by reducing the availability of infected plant material. Proper irrigation can help to reduce the risk of disease by ensuring that plants have adequate water but are not too wet, which can also reduce the risk of disease.

In conclusion, it is important to maintain good crop management practices and to be aware of the potential for tomato diseases. By monitoring the health of your plants and taking appropriate action if you notice signs of disease, you can help to prevent and control tomato diseases and ensure a successful tomato harvest.

Homeowners vs. Termites

Termites are considered one of the most destructive pests that can affect homes and properties. They are social insects that build colonies and feed on wood, which can cause significant damage to structures if left untreated. Homeowners may experience termites if they live in regions where termite infestations are common, such as parts of the southern United States and coastal areas. Termites can attack any wooden structure, including homes, sheds, and other outdoor structures.

Termites are unique pests because they are not insects but rather a type of fungus, called fungi, that feeds on wood. They have a specific metabolism that allows them to break down cellulose in wood, which provides them with a food source. Termites are able to infest structures because they can enter through small gaps or cracks, and they can cause significant damage over time.

Termites can be difficult to detect because they do not cause visible damage until it is too late. They are silent pests that can go undetected for years, until a problem is discovered. Homeowners may notice signs of termite damage such as wood that is spongy or appears to be crumbling or by finding small tunnels or mud tubes in walls or other structures.

Termites are classified into two major groups: the drywood termite and the dampwood termite. Drywood termites live in dry, well-ventilated areas and do not require moisture to survive. They are found in regions with low humidity, such as the southern United States. Dampwood termites, on the other hand, require moisture to survive and are found in regions with higher humidity, such as the northeastern United States.

In conclusion, it is important for homeowners to be aware of the potential for termite damage and to take appropriate action if you suspect a termite infestation. By monitoring the health of your property and taking proactive measures to prevent and control termite damage, you can help to ensure the longevity and durability of your home.
